Marine Lance Cpl. Patrick T. O'Day married his high school sweetheart shortly before heading overseas and was looking forward to the birth of their first child, due in September. "They were a young couple with a lot of dreams and hopes," said his father, Tim O'Day. "I think he would've made a wonderful father. He always had a lot of patience, very understanding." O'Day, who lived in Santa Rosa, CA, died in combat March 25. He was drawn to the Corps because of its allure as the toughest of the military branches, said his wife, Shauna O'Day. During boot camp, he developed stress fractures in his legs. But rather than accept a medical discharge, he spent six months in a rehabilitation platoon, then returned to boot camp and completed his training as a tank gunner. "He was proud to be a Marine," his wife said. "He liked their reputation and he liked their discipline."

His unit was the quick reaction force and was responding to enemy fire. Long before he died, Osbaldo Orozco was a hero in his hometown of Earlimart, CA, a tiny farming community north of Fresno. It wasn't just that "Baldo" was a high school and college football star, or that he was the first in his family to graduate from college, or even that he had joined the Army as an officer. "He loved everybody, and everybody loved him," said his brother, Jorge. "He was always the first one to say, 'Hi.' As soon as he came down the street, everyone knew Baldo, and he knew everyone." Orozco, 26, attended California Polytechnic State University in San Luis Obispo on a full football scholarship. As a sophomore, he earned the team's third highest record ever for tackles. In his junior year, he led the team in tackles. In his senior year, he was voted the football team's most inspirational player. "His parents came to every game. They'd work in the fields in the morning, then they'd drive 2 hours to the coast to watch him play. Five or six times, his town loaded up buses with kids and they all came out to watch him play. His parents' bosses in the fields would come out and watch him play. He was a hero in that town," recalled college friend and teammate, Juan Gonzalez, now a high school counselor in San Jose. Orozco graduated from college in 2001, received his Army commission and married his high school sweetheart. "He was someone who only comes along once in a long while," his brother said. "I don't have the words to say how important he was to us."
