Marine Corps Capt. Arthur J. Jackson, who received the Medal of Honor for killing 50 Japanese soldiers and silencing a dozen enemy pillboxes during the World War II battle of Peleliu, and almost two decades later was forced out of the service after covering up his slaying of an alleged Cuban spy, died June 14 in Boise, Idaho. He was 92. The Congressional Medal of Honor Society announced the death but did not provide a cause. Pfc. Jackson, then 19, was with the 1st Marine Division in the western Pacific during one of the most grueling battles in that theater of operations. He was among the wave of U.S. forces that landed on Japanese-controlled Peleliu on Sept. 15, 1944, with the intent of overtaking it within days and securing the entire Palau Islands chain in advance of the invasion of the Philippines and Japan. Instead they met a large, determined and heavily fortified Japanese resistance, about 11,000 troops in all, that inflicted heavy casualties and kept the battle raging for two months before

U.S. forces prevailed. Eventually more than 27,000 Americans were involved in the struggle for Peleliu, and they endured one of the highest rates of death and injury in the Pacific, with at least 2,300 killed and 8,400 wounded. Pfc. Jackson's unit was ordered to clear the southern end of the island, but on Sept. 18, they were stalled by a storm of enemy gunfire coming from a large Japanese bunker. He was told to move ahead alone and clear it. Loaded up with grenades, he charged the pillbox, raking it with automatic fire while discharging white phosphorus grenades and other explosives. He was credited with killing all 35 occupants. Continuing alone and again at tremendous peril, he repeated the same maneuver at 11 smaller pillboxes that contained another 15 Japanese soldiers. "Stouthearted and indomitable despite the terrific odds, Pfc. Jackson resolutely maintained control of the platoon's left flank movement throughout his valiant one-man assault and, by his cool decision and relentless fighting spirit during a critical situation, contributed essentially to the complete annihilation of the enemy in the southern sector of the island," read his citation for the Medal of Honor, the military's highest award for valor. He was wounded both at Peleliu and subsequently at Okinawa, receiving two Purple Hearts. In October 1945, President Harry S. Truman bestowed the medal on then-2nd Lt. Jackson at a White House ceremony. He met with dignitaries including Adm. Chester W. Nimitz and Gen. James H. Doolittle. He was feted in a Manhattan ticker-tape parade, riding in a car with columnist Walter Winchell. Four years later, he joined the Army as a commissioned officer. But after a decade, he returned to the Marines and was serving as a company commander at Guantanamo Bay on Sept. 30, 1961 — during the unnerving interim between the disastrous Bay of Pigs invasion and the Cuban missile crisis. On that night, then-Capt. Jackson said he was alarmed to find a 44-year-old Cuban, Ruben Lopez, in a restricted part of the base used for ammunition storage. Lopez worked as a bus driver on the site, even though he expressed openly pro-Fidel Castro sympathies and was under surveillance by naval intelligence. On his own initiative, Capt. Jackson decided to eject Lopez with the help of his executive officer, Marine 1st Lt. William Szili. They said they marched him to a long-unused rear gate, but they found the lock rusted shut. Capt. Jackson said he sent Szili to get something to break the lock and, while left alone, Lopez leapt at him. He shot the Cuban with his sidearm. With the assistance of a few other Marines, Capt. Jackson buried Lopez in a shallow grave on the base. Szili described an atmosphere of heavy drinking on the base — he said he had been with Capt. Jackson at an officer's bar on the night of the killing — and that word of the death leaked during one cocktail party. After the body was discovered, the Defense Department issued a terse statement noting an investigation was underway. The story gained no traction, but Capt. Jackson quietly left the military in March 1962 after being denied a court-martial (and the publicity it could generate) to clear his name. The full tale came to light in April 1963, when Capt. Jackson was poised to appear at a White House event with President John F. Kennedy honoring Medal of Honor recipients. Szili said he had been discharged by that time — under threat of a $10,000 fine and 10 years in prison if he disclosed the killing — and he was seeking reinstatement. The Philadelphia Bulletin and the syndicated columnist Jack Anderson reported the cover-up, a Cold War blockbuster that had the potential to become an international incident. Capt. Jackson, then working as a $90-a-week letter carrier in San Jose, sent his regrets to the White House. He stayed mum, but his wife spoke to the San Jose Mercury News to say her husband had been "thrown out" of the corps and pressed into signing a statement forbidding discussion of the incident, lest he face the same fine and imprisonment as Szili. He left 18 months before he was eligible for a full pension. He later worked in a warehouse and managed a pizza parlor before joining the Veterans Administration and retiring as chief of veterans services for Idaho. Arthur Junior Jackson was born in Cleveland on Oct. 18, 1924, and grew up in Canton, OH, and later Portland, OR, moving for his father's job as a watchmaker during the Depression. He was a high school athlete, lettering in baseball, football and track. After graduation, he left for a construction job in Alaska, helping build a runway at a naval air station near Sitka. After enlisting in the Marine Corps as an infantryman, he distinguished himself during the New Britain campaign in the Pacific in late 1943. His first marriage, to the former Dolores Bawden, ended in divorce. Survivors include his wife, Kathlyn Doell Jackson of Boise; five children from his first marriage, A.J. Jackson of Ashland, OR, Kathy Watson of Rhinelander, WI, Susan Claycomb of Lakewood, CO, Lori Hickerson of Littleton, CO, and Monte Jackson of Boise; seven grandchildren; and seven great-grandsons. Capt. Jackson, who said he long felt "ashamed" of his Guantanamo killing, did not speak publicly about the incident until an Idaho Statesman reporter interviewed him in 2013. He said his key concern was his "understanding" of a treaty between the United States and Cuba that could have resulted in his detention in a notorious Cuban prison. "I hoped no one would find out," he told the newspaper. "The world found out."

JENSON, Chad Elliott Jenson

(Abstracted from <http://www.dailybreeze.com/obituaries/20170713/marine-from-redondo-beach-among-dead-in-mississippi-military-air-crash>)

A Mira Costa High School graduate who helped lead his Manhattan Beach football team to a championship in 2009 was among the group of elite U.S. Marines killed when their KC-130 Hercules aircraft crashed in western Mississippi this week, family members and friends said Thursday. Sgt. Chad Elliott Jenson, age 25, who grew up in Redondo Beach, where his family still resides, was among the 15 Marines and a Navy sailor who died Monday when the plane went down in a soybean field in Leflore County in the Mississippi Delta. No one survived. "This kid was a true American and a true patriot," said Chuck Arrasmith, Jenson's offensive line coach at Mira Costa. "He was a man for others. He was a man that doesn't see a ceiling in his life. He just keeps breaking through and achieving more." Jenson, who served with the 2nd Raider Battalion, Special Operations Command was based at Camp Lejeune in North Carolina, is survived by his wife of eight months, Jessica, and a stepson, according to his Facebook page and friends. "It's unfair — someone so genuine, so selfless. Someone like that didn't deserve this," said friend and former teammate Jake Jelmini. "But he was doing something he loved. He was doing something that he stood behind 115 percent." "For our high school team, he was the center," Jelmini said. "He was the guy who set up everybody else on the line." Kyle Demarco, Mira Costa's CIF championship quarterback, said he broke into tears when he learned Jenson had died in the crash. "He touched so many people's lives," Demarco said. "If I have a kid one day, I want him to have the type of character that Chad did." Arrasmith spoke proudly of the young man he came to know as a student and remained close to as he served his country, signing up for the military soon after graduation and achieving a spot in the Marine Corps Special Forces Command. Jenson always contacted his coach when he returned home for visits. "He's exactly the kind of person you would want representing the United States in the position that he's in," Arrasmith said. "I can't even imagine a group of people like him being together, how powerful they'd be. They would not see defeat." Search teams continued Thursday combing a 5-mile debris field about 100 miles north of Jackson. One of the plane's engines was located on Wednesday. The plane disappeared from radar at 20,000 feet while on its way to its first stop in El Centro, CA. Witnesses said the aircraft spiraled into the ground, looking like a stunt plane as it went down. The plane was scheduled to take the Camp Lejeune troops to Yuma, AZ, for training. Word of Jenson's death spread quickly on social media, including on Mira Costa-related sites and among fellow Marines. On the Mira Costa varsity football team, Arrasmith said Jenson took over as center as a junior in 2008 when a senior was injured. Jenson was "a good-size kid," who admittedly wasn't the most gifted, athletic, fast or coordinated player on the field, Arrasmith said. But he quickly gained the admiration of his coaches and teammates for his hard work to improve his body and his play. "He played with a lot of reckless abandon, and the kids loved him for that," Arrasmith said. "His motor started and it never stopped running. ... Chad was just driving down the field, making the block and then he would turn right around and help the running back right up. He was a man for everybody else on the team."

Demarco said Jenson started as a "goofball type of guy," but led by example, starting weight-lifting programs and playing summer football to turn himself into one of the best centers in California by the time he was a senior. "After a play, he would come flying over the pile at full speed. He played through the whistle," Demarco said. "I think he did that in life, too." Telling friends he wanted to serve his country, Jenson signed up for the Marine Corps in 2010. Jelmini said the Marines suited Jenson because he possessed "that cognitive ability to think in a strategic manner, thinking five steps ahead" of those around him. "Those are the kinds of guys they desire to have," Jelmini said. "That's why I think he was so prepared for it. He understood what he was getting himself into. He knew the risks involved, but he was willing to look at those and say 'I'll take on this challenge.'" By 2013, Jenson applied for Marine Corps Forces Special Operations Command, a team similar to the Navy SEALs. On leave, Jenson filled a backpack with bricks, strapped it to his back and ran up and down the stairs at school. Coaches found him in the school's pool, trying to turn himself into a swimmer. "He knew going into that that this was going to be an extreme challenge," Arrasmith said. "There was a lot of swimming and a lot of mountain climbing and foreign languages. ... He was on a mission. He knew it would be difficult and he knew there are a limited amount of guys who can make it." During the past few years, every time Jenson returned home, his body was more "ripped." He talked about learning Farsi or taking weapons training or swims in the ocean tethered to seven other Marines. "Every time you would see Chad Jenson he would have a smile on his face," his coach said. "He was so proud of his accomplishments and proud to be representing the Marine Corps and the United States of America." Demarco said Jenson's death has left him in disbelief. He looked into Jenson's eyes before every play on the football field and never imagined "the guy who could climb over any obstacle" would be gone at 25. "Gone from us way too soon," he said.

The father of a U.S. Marine killed Monday in a military plane crash in Mississippi said his son loved his job and found a love for nature during his early life in Colchester. "He loved the outdoors and he loved flying with the Marine Corps," Kevin Johnson said in a telephone interview Wednesday. "He told me, 'Dad, I've got the best job in the Corps.'" Brendan Johnson, age 45, a U.S. Marine Corps gunnery sergeant who lived in Fishkill, NY was identified as one of 16 people who died when the aircraft crashed into a soybean field. "This wasn't supposed to happen. I'm not supposed to bury a child," Kevin Johnson said. Brendan Johnson grew up in Colchester, where he participated in Boy Scouts and learned camping and cooking skills that would prove helpful later when he attended boot camp. He graduated from Colchester High School in 1989 and went on to attend Johnson State College. Initially a biology major, Brendan Johnson would sketch drawings of the biological samples he used in class, his father said. An instructor noticed and prompted Brendan Johnson to pursue a degree in fine arts. After graduation in 1994, he joined the Marine Corps and became a loadmaster, the person on a plane responsible for loading and unloading cargo and calculating weights. The job took him all over the world, and when he had a chance he would explore museums or spend time looking at architecture. "He always liked the military," Kevin Johnson said. "He liked the outdoors. He was a Boy Scout. He liked camping and being out in the woods." Kevin Johnson said his son was planning to retire next year and eventually move to Montana with his wife, Anna. He talked about becoming a park ranger or game warden or taking another outdoor job. On July 10, Brendan Johnson was on board a KC-130T plane that took off from Cherry Point, NC. It was a plane from Marine Air Refueler Transport Squadron 452 based at Stewart Air National Guard Base in Newburgh, NY. The 15 Marines and one Navy corpsman on board planned to travel to El Centro, CA, and then to Yuma, AZ, by ground transport, according to a U.S. Marine Corps statement. "Indications are something went wrong at cruise altitude. There is a large debris pattern," said Brig. Gen. Bradley S. James, commanding general for the 4th Marine Aircraft Wing.

JONES, George Jones

(Abstracted from <http://www.foxnews.com/entertainment/2013/04/26/george-jones-dead-country-superstar-was-82/>)

George Jones, the peerless, hard-living country singer who recorded dozens of hits about good times and regrets and peaked with the heartbreaking classic "He Stopped Loving Her Today," has died. He was 81. Jones died Friday at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville after being hospitalized with fever and irregular blood pressure, according to his publicist Kirt Webster. With one of the most golden voices of any genre, a clenched, precise, profoundly expressive baritone, Jones had No. 1 songs in five separate decades, 1950s to 1990s. He was idolized not just by fellow country artists, but by Frank Sinatra, Pete Townshend, Elvis Costello, James Taylor and countless others. "If we all could sound like we wanted to, we'd all sound like George Jones," Waylon Jennings once sang. In a career that lasted more than 50 years, "Possum" evolved from young honky-tonker to elder statesman as he recorded more than 150 albums and became the champion and symbol of traditional country music, a well-lined link to his hero, Hank Williams. Jones survived long battles with alcoholism and drug addiction, brawls, accidents and close encounters with death, including bypass surgery and a tour bus crash that he only avoided by deciding at the last moment to take a plane. His failure to appear for concerts left him with the nickname "No Show Jones," and he later recorded a song by that name and often opened his shows by singing it. His wild life was revealed in song and in his handsome, troubled face, with its dark, deep-set eyes and dimpled chin. In song, he was rowdy and regretful, tender and tragic. His hits included the sentimental "Who's Gonna Fill Their Shoes," the foot-tapping "The Race is On," the foot-stomping "I Don't Need Your Rockin' Chair," the melancholy "She Thinks I Still Care," the rockin' "White Lightning," and the barfly lament "Still Doing Time." Jones also recorded several duets with Tammy Wynette, his wife for six years, including "Golden Ring," "Near You," "Southern California" and "We're Gonna Hold On." He also sang with such peers as Willie Nelson and Merle Haggard and with Costello and other rock performers. But his signature song was "He Stopped Loving Her Today," a weeper among weepers about a man who carries his love for a woman to his grave. The 1980 ballad, which Jones was sure would never be a hit, often appears on surveys as the most popular country song of all time. Jones won Grammy awards in 1981 for "He Stopped Loving Her Today" and in 1999 for "Choices." He was elected to the Country Music Hall of Fame in 1992 and in 2008 was among the artists honored in Washington at the Kennedy Center. Jones continued to make appearances and put out records, though his hit records declined. "I don't want to completely quit because I don't know what to do with myself," he said in 2005. "I'll be out there as long as the people want me to be out there." Jones was a purist who lamented the transformation of country music from the family feeling of the 1950s to the hit factory of the early 21st century. He was so caught up in country, old country, that when a record company executive suggested he record with James Taylor, Jones insisted he had never heard of the million selling singer-songwriter. He was equally unimpressed when told that Neil Young had come to visit backstage and declined to see him, saying he didn't know who he was. He did listen to the Rolling Stones, only because of the guitar playing of Keith Richards, a country fan who would eventually record with Jones. Asked about what he thought about Carrie Underwood, Taylor Swift and other young stars, Jones said they were good but they weren't making traditional country music. "What they need to do really, I think, is find their own title," he said. In 1991, country star Alan Jackson dedicated his hit song "Don't Rock the Jukebox" to Jones, asking in the song that country music remain faithful to the Jones style instead of drifting toward rock 'n' roll. Jones was born Sept. 12, 1931, in a log house near the east Texas town of Saratoga, the youngest of eight children. He sang in church and at age 11 began performing for tips on the streets of Beaumont, Texas. His first outing was such a success that listeners tossed him coins, placed a cup by his side and filled it with money. Jones estimated he made more than $24 for his two-hour performance, enough to feed his family for a week, but he used up the cash at a local arcade. "That was my first time to earn money for singing and my first time to blow it afterward," he recalled in "I Lived to Tell it All," a painfully self-critical memoir published in 1996. "It started what almost became a lifetime trend." The family lived in a government-subsidized housing project, and his father, a laborer, was an alcoholic who would rouse the children from bed in the middle of the night to sing for him. His father also noted that young George liked music and bought him a Gene Autry guitar, with a horse and lariat on the front, which Jones practiced on obsessively. He got his start on radio with husband and wife team Eddie & Pearl in the late 1940s. Hank Williams once dropped by the studio to promote a new record, and Jones was invited to back him on guitar. When it came time to play, he froze. "Hank had 'Wedding Bells' out at the time," Jones recalled in a 2003 Associated Press interview. "He started singing it, and I never hit the first note the whole song. I just stared." After the first of his four marriages failed, he enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1951 and served three years. He cut his first record when he got out, an original fittingly called "No Money in This Deal." He had his first hit with "Why Baby Why" in 1955, and by the early '60s Jones was one of country music's top stars. "I sing top songs that fit the hardworking, everyday loving person. That's what country music is about," Jones said in a 1991 AP interview. "My fans and real true country music fans know I'm not a phony. I just sing it the way it is and put feeling in it if I can and try to live the song." Jones was married to Wynette, his third wife, from 1969 to 1975. (Wynette died in 1998.) Their relationship played out in Nashville like a country song, with hard drinking, fights and reconciliations. Jones' weary knowledge of domestic warfare was immortalized in such classics as "The Battle," set to the martial beat of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic." After one argument, Jones drove off on a riding mower in search of a drink because Wynette had taken his car keys to keep him from carousing. Years earlier, married to his second wife, he had also sped off in a mower in search of a drink. Jones referred to his mowing days in the 1996 release, "Honky Tonk Song." His drug and alcohol abuse grew worse in the late '70s, and Jones had to file for bankruptcy in 1978. A manager had started him on cocaine, hoping to counteract his boozy, lethargic performances, and Jones was eventually arrested in Jackson, MS, in 1983 on cocaine possession charges. He agreed to perform a benefit concert and was sentenced to six months probation. "In the 1970s, I was drunk the majority of the time," Jones wrote in his memoir. "If you saw me sober, chances are you saw me asleep." In 1980, a 3-minute song changed his life. His longtime producer, Billy Sherrill, recommended he record "He Stopped Loving Her Today," a ballad by Curly Putnam and Bobby Braddock. The song took more than a year to record, partly because Jones couldn't master the melody, which he confused with Kris Kristofferson's "Help Me Make it Through the Night," and partly because he was too drunk to recite a brief, spoken interlude ("She came to see him one last time/And we all wondered if she would/And it kept running through my mind/This time he's over her for good.") "Pretty simple, eh?" Jones wrote in his memoir. "I couldn't get it. I had been able to sing while drunk all of my life. I'd fooled millions of people. But I could never speak without slurring when drunk. What we needed to complete that song was the narration, but Billy could never catch me sober enough to record four simple spoken lines." Jones was convinced the song was too "morbid" to catch on. But "He Stopped Loving Her Today," featuring a string section that hummed, then soared, became an instant standard and virtually canonized him. His concert fee jumped from $2,500 a show to $25,000. "There is a God," he recalled. In 1983, Jones married his fourth and final wife, Nancy Sepulveda, whom he credited with stabilizing his private life. He had four children, one with first wife Dorothy Bonvillion, two with second wife Shirley Ann Corley and one with Wynette. His daughter with Wynette, Georgette Jones, became a country singer and even played her mother in the 2008 TV series "Sordid Lives."

(Abstracted from <http://www.legacy.com/obituaries/theeveningleader/obituary>)

Susannah Mushatt Jones, the world's oldest person, died May 12, 2016. She was 116 years and 311 days old, the last American born in the 19th century. Born July 6, 1899, in Lowndes County, Alabama, Jones was the granddaughter of slaves. She dreamed of becoming a teacher, but couldn't afford tuition to the Tuskegee Institute and instead moved to New York, NY, and worked in child care. Jones was briefly married, from 1928 to 1933, but had no children. However, she had more than 100 nieces and nephews. When Time magazine asked her secret for longevity, Jones just offered, "Believe in the Lord." Some attribute her long life to clean living: she never smoked or drank alcohol. But she ate four strips of bacon for breakfast every morning, along with scrambled eggs, grits, and a multivitamin. Jones founded the Calhoun Club, a scholarship fund for students at the high school she attended, the Calhoun Boarding High School. In 2012, U.S. Rep. Edolphus Towns of New York paid tribute to Jones several days after her 113th birthday. "Lovingly called 'Miss Susie,' she is a symbol of longevity and commitment to family for all New Yorkers and our nation," Towns told his colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives. "This milestone gives all of us hope that people can truly live a long prosperous life," he said.
